

The case for a small sustainable Australia

Fact Box
 The question must be:
 Does this asylum seeker or migrant value add to Australia in the long term?
 If not, no permanent residency visa, no chance of citizenship - ever!

Arguments for a Small (Sustainable) Australia (and therefore Arguments against a Big Australia)

1. Australia is already desperately short of water, a situation likely to get worse over time.
2. The "logic" of needing lots of new workers (taxpayers) to support the ageing workforce is fatally flawed. Who supports these workers when they are older and eventually, the nation collapses under its own weight of unsustainable numbers? It is a giant Ponzi scheme... a fraud.
3. Many recent arrivals are likely to be forever religiously and culturally incompatible with the Australian way of life and Australian values. In other words, a long term net liability to Australia.
4. Most arguments favouring a Big Australia are based on the implicit assumption that Australia will always be primarily dependent on its Resources Sector. A diversified economy must be our aim.
5. Infrastructure development never keeps up with population growth and many governments typically take a short term view, ie- spend only what is necessary to get re-elected.
6. Congestion on the roads, lack of water, other forms of pollution, will all dramatically increase. The Australian quality of life will fall into the abyss forever due to overcrowding and corruption.
7. Without careful and selective immigration there will be a progressive loss of our Australian identity and culture.
8. Large influxes of skilled and semi-skilled workers, their families, and their extended families, during Boom times cannot easily be repatriated during Bad times. Future workers from overseas must be contract only - with no path to permanent residency or citizenship.
8. A proportion of new arrivals (mainly those from Muslim sources, including from the UK on British passports) will never put Australia first.
